Enterprise selling is not for the meek

Only 15% of 'C' level executives felt their meetings with sales people were valuable, and only 7% would accept follow-on meetings based on the outcome of the initial meeting.

Coping in a flat, loud, difficult world

Your pipeline reports likely reveal the effects of the seismic changes occurring in business today.

Armed with information from the Internet, time-pressured buyers are continually scanning for a better answer. Social media increase the reach, power, and influence of every prospect—and raise expectations that suppliers will listen and respond.

With this new power, buyers no longer give vendors the level of control they once did.

🗨️ Two-thirds of global industries are now in fundamental flux; finding profitable growth will challenge even the best companies in the unstable recovery 🍎🍎 ahead.

Sales reps are struggling to stay current

The challenge of selling in complex environments to Web-informed prospects grows every day. Many formerly successful sales pros are struggling to meet quota in these unpredictable times.

Reps must be able to understand and meet each customer's needs as they move through the sales process. To be relevant, they must deliver a tailored pitch that aligns with each customer's spending priorities. But constantly shifting customer preferences and competitive moves make it difficult to execute effectively.

All the while, product planners force more features and options into increasingly complex solutions, making it harder to explain your differentiated value to prospects.

Marketing can bring a new kind of support

Marketing can support sales in a new and needed way by delivering customer, market, and sales intelligence, packaged for action, directly to the front line.

In bringing customer and competitor insights, process discipline, and execution resources, marketing can deliver value beyond brand building and lead generation.

The result is a new form of sales-led marketing that

- Increases coverage and pipeline as reps get up to speed faster and build more relevant pitches
- Shortens time to close and increases close rates through improved competitive sell- against and a more efficient discovery process
- Leads to larger and more strategic deals when your solutions are framed in a “burning platform” customer context

Put your messaging in C-level context

Attention-challenged decision-makers have little patience for a “cut-and-paste” pitch. Buyers expect sellers to know exactly what matters to them. You have to connect your value proposition to relevant customer criteria, understanding your customer’s role and industry-specific concerns.

But being more meaningful to customers is meaningless if your message isn’t unique. We also build sales arguments that help your reps quickly and powerfully differentiate your solutions from those of your competitors.
